

Reflection on a personal experience of surviving contemporary conversion practices in Australia

Identifying and protecting people from conversion practices is an ethical obligation for health care professionals

I knew I was gay in high school. There was no confusion or struggle internally, I just was. The pain came from trying to work out what to do about it. Unfortunately, I was exposed to many complex and conflicting ideas about what being gay meant for me and my life.

“Conversion practices” is a broad term referring to any formal or informal intervention or attempts to change or suppress someone’s sexual orientation or gender identity.^{1,2} It is a problem that remains endemic in Australia.^{1,3,4} “Conversion practices” has more recently replaced the term “conversion therapy” to better reflect the range of interventions that can be involved.¹

The first person I came out to was my best friend in 2009, who told me that if I “chose” to be gay, I would be fundamentally unlovable and would burn in hell forever. They told me they loved me and were telling me this because they loved me, and I believed them. Suffice to say I did not come out to anyone else for years. When I did it was to a pastor who encouraged me to date people of the opposite sex if I “could”. Long after that, I told the person I eventually married as I felt they surely had a right to know.

The year 2017 was the most difficult and damaging year of my life. As I tried to leave this community for a number of reasons, attempts to suppress, convert or “cure” me intensified as more people found out about me. That was also when these attempts started to actively involve other health care professionals. Specifically, a general practitioner and a psychologist.

In counselling and therapy sessions, I was told by these health professionals that it would be better for me to be dead than divorced. I was told that regardless of what I did with my life, it would not matter. Whatever care and compassion I showed people, how much good I tried to do in the world, no matter who I loved or how, none of it would matter. It wouldn’t count the way it did for other people. I was told that being gay would invalidate my entire life and that nothing could ever make up for that. I was told I would lose my family and friends, and have a lonely, loveless, condemned and worthless life. I was exposed, degraded and humiliated in front of people. I was given resources including a book by a celibate “same-sex attracted” pastor as an instruction for how I should live.

During that time in 2017, I was working in hospitals completing my first year of general practice training. At that early stage in my career, and in the midst of manipulative behaviour under the guise of having my best interests at heart, I was not able to recognise how deeply unethical and damaging the treatment I received from these people really was. For quite some time, I was also prevented from accessing appropriate, professional and competent health care. I am infinitely grateful for the people I met when I did, and that it was not too late for me. Brilliant doctors and psychologists eventually protected me, and gave me the space, time and therapy I needed to begin to heal from prolonged traumas.

In hindsight, I lived in and around a community with a culture of conversion practices, spiritual abuse, and coercive control for almost 10 years. However, being subjected to these practices by health care professionals had a particularly profound impact on me as a doctor. I had to reconcile having been harmed by people within the system I am a part of, by colleagues. These were people I assumed I could trust, who were taught to first, do no harm. To do good. To treat people fairly and equitably. To uphold and protect individual autonomy.

My experience showed me the power that we have as doctors by experiencing the abuse of that power. I perhaps naively assumed that an individual’s professional ethical obligations would outweigh their personal beliefs in this context. Even if this was challenging for them, I trusted that the escalating pain I was in would make it clear that their approach was wrong. It never did.

Being a responsible doctor involves lifelong learning, reflection, ethical conduct, and practising evidence-based medicine. There is overwhelming evidence of the harms inflicted by conversion practices, and that they do not work.¹⁻⁴ Both the Australian Medical Association⁵ and the Australian Psychological Society⁶ have released position statements denouncing conversion practices.

Many people reading this will be surprised to know conversion practices still happen in Australia. Although the methods and rhetoric have changed over time, they remain prevalent.^{1,3} Conversion practices in contemporary Australia are deceptive and insidious. They are often conducted by people and communities who claim to be “welcoming” and “loving” to gender and sexually diverse people, but in fact treat homosexuality and gender dysphoria like any other “sinful temptation” to be fought, potentially for your entire life. This polite duplicitousness causes immeasurable confusion, shame and complex trauma for so many people, and takes the lives of many others.¹⁻⁴

I also know many people reading this article may find it challenging or uncomfortable because of their own personal beliefs. If this is you, instead of fighting any discomfort you may have, be curious about it. Ask yourself why you feel uncomfortable. Difference is nothing to be afraid of, but ignorance is. It is ignorance that hurts people, not difference. At some point you were taught what to think and feel about these issues, as we all were. Our knowledge and opinions are learned over time. Although continuing professional development can feel like the bane of one's existence when busy and overworked, ongoing learning and self-reflection really is an integral part of being a good doctor. Growth, both personally and professionally, always involves change. It is important to challenge and refine your views and practices over time. It is okay to change your mind. In fact, when the evidence is clear, it can be unwise and harmful not to.

I was originally commissioned to write this article after delivering a speech at the Royal Australian College of General Practitioners Fellowship Ceremony in October 2021, where I shared part of my story publicly for the first time. To be honest, I was fairly convinced I would either get in trouble for talking about it, or people wouldn't care. It is not easy to talk or write about complex trauma, and it hadn't been possible for me for a long time. It is harder still when you assume you have a hostile audience based on past experience. However, the reception and feedback was incredible. Having colleagues, strangers, family and friends show their support, come up and thank me or discuss their own experiences or those of loved ones was overwhelming. I didn't expect it at all, so I had no concept of how positive and helpful it could have been for me personally. It took the first ten to 15 people at least for me to start to trust that people weren't lining up to have a go at me. After that, I felt something physically start to shift in me. A constant hum of threat, a baseline fight-flight energy that I felt and sometimes still feel in medical circles started to settle. I left that event feeling, for the first time, truly seen, valued and safe in my professional community.

Although I have had some truly awful experiences in my life, they have overall been completely outweighed by the good. It has taken a long time and a lot of work, but I now know that I am truly valued and loved. I have great friends, family, colleagues and a fantastic partner. So, finally, to anyone reading this who is in a similar position to where I was: it may not feel like it, but you are and will be okay. It may not be the people you hope or expect, but there are so many people who do and will love, accept and value you. There are people who will help you if and when you are no longer able to help yourself. Do not give up looking for them.

Competing interests: No relevant disclosures.

Provenance: Commissioned; not externally peer reviewed. ■

If this article has raised issues for you or anyone you know, please contact Lifeline on 13 11 14 (www.lifeline.org.au), Beyond Blue (www.beyondblue.org.au) on 1300 22 46 36, ACON (www.acon.org.au) or QLife (www.qlife.org.au).

© 2022 AMPCo Pty Ltd.

- 1 Power J, Jones TW, Jones T, et al. Better understanding of the scope and nature of LGBTQA+ religious conversion practices will support recovery. Med J Aust 2022; <https://doi.org/10.5694/mja2.5144> [Epub ahead of print]. <https://www.mja.com.au/journal/2022/217/3/better-understanding-scope-and-nature-lgbtqa-religious-conversion-practices-will>
- 2 United Nations General Assembly. Practices of so-called "conversion therapy": report of the Independent Expert on protection against violence and discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity — Human Rights Council, 44th session. Geneva: United Nations, 2020. <https://undocs.org/A/HRC/44/53> (viewed Feb 2022).
- 3 Jones TW, Brown A, Carnie L, et al. Preventing harm, promoting justice: responding to LGBT conversion therapy in Australia. Melbourne: La Trobe University and Human Rights Law Centre, 2018. <https://static1.squarespace.com/static/580025f66b8f5b2dabbe4291/t/5bd78764eef1a1ba57990efe/1540851637658/LGBT+conversion+therapy+in+Australia+v2.pdf> (viewed Feb 2022).
- 4 Jones TW, Jones TM, Power J, et al. Healing spiritual harms: supporting recovery from LGBTQA+ change and suppression practices [Report No. 0645025666]. Melbourne: La Trobe University, 2021. https://www.latrobe.edu.au/_data/assets/pdf_file/0007/1201588/Healing-spiritual-harms-Supporting-recovery-from-LGBTQA-change-and-suppression-practices.pdf (viewed Feb 2022).
- 5 Australian Medical Association. LGBTQIA+ health — 2021 [position statement]. Canberra: AMA, 2021. <https://www.ama.com.au/articles/lgbtqia-health-2021> (viewed Feb 2022).
- 6 Australian Psychological Society. Use of psychological practices that attempt to change or suppress sexual orientation or gender: position statement. Melbourne: APS, 2021. <https://psychology.org.au/about-us/what-we-do/advocacy/position-statements/psychological-practices-conversion-practices> (viewed Feb 2022). ■